CHAPTER XX.

Before giving a sketch of the progress of agriculture in this country, it may be description of its soil, mineral and forest productions. By reference to the map of Kentucky, it will be seen that Ohio, after being so repeatedly curtailed in forming counies of Butier, Muhlenberg, McLenu. Daviess, Hancock, Breckenridge and Graveon-Green river forms a large por tion of its south-eastern and south-wes tern boundary. This stream is the most gentle, deep, and beautiful stream in the interior of Kentucky; passing through a low, wide bottom, mostly subject to overflow, but where not too awampy, extremely fertile. Rough creek is also among the largest tributaries to Green river, and divides the county into two nearly count portions. Hartford is situated on this stream twenty-eight miles by its meenders above its mouth. It also has a deep, gentle current, and a wide helt of bottom lands, many of which are and accending to higher grades of hilly, ally a mixture of clay, sand and loam, with but little lime or limestone.
